You've successfully reported this review. But he was usually oblivious to the greens of flowers and trees or the blues of skies. I like his delivery: friendly, relatively unpretentious. Dyer continued in this segmental thread to the "me that is seen" and used several photographs of Diane Arbus, Alfred Stieglitz, Paul Strand, and others taken by photographers other than themselves to make his point again of them all being of the common pictorial tradition or reciprocity. Dyer muses about the art of photography by linking pictures he knows with each. By organizing his material in such an open-ended manner, Dyer risks going in circles.

Other editions. Your local Waterstones may have stock of this item. Jae Emerling. Especially after reading these chapters, the rest of the book left me wanting as much heart as I found with these .
