This early occupation facilitated the founding of the two Boer republics, bo In one of the exchanges collected in Doubling the Pointe contrasts the almost infinite lattice of a shared European culture drawn on by a poet like Zbigniew Herbert with the absence of prior literary models for white writing in South African context: In Africa the only address one can imagine is a brutally direct one, a sort of pure, unmediated representation; what short-circuits the imagination, what forces one's face into the thing itself, is what I am here calling history. The other pole will emerge in later chapters through the sparse and self-aware oeuvre of J.
